Brazilian red grape crop concluded in 2011

Brazilian red grape crop was concluded at the end of March/ 2011 and processed volumes as well as product quality were very good, achieving processor's expectations.

This way, we have red grape juice concentrate supply available during the year and considering that the harvest is during the beginning of each year, we recommend our customers inform us their needs in order to schedule deliveries.

Pink guava: considering that Brazil is entering the winter season, there is a natural fall in availability of this fresh fruit; keep in mind we will be shipping on regular basis during this time when contracting your needs in advance.

Let us know your needs!

Pineapple: keep an eye on it

Brazilian pineapple Perola season in North region of Brazil has been active since April with better characteristics than last year; weather was appropriate and fruit has good quality, what does not mean abundance or cheap fruit, on the contrary, demand is high and there is competition between the industry and fresh market who both receive new customers each time, a result of a government politics to empower people of low income to start consuming new products.

In Thailand, season is monitored with attention because, after a wet winter which results in an over-fertilized land and an excessive quantity of nitrates into the fruit, also as per Juice Market of May, "the hot weather is causing concern over both high ratios and lower juice yields", considering that dry weather means a high sugar content while noting that Europe wants lower ratios.

Other sources like Costa Rica, Philippines, Indonesia and South Africa are, if not sold out, very short.
